Abstract

In terms of age and ability, youth is a productive human population. Employment of youth plays a crucial role in the transition of young people and the overall economic development of a country. The unemployment of youth will result in social exclusion and unrest among young people. At the same time, employing all the youth is a challenging task for a country. Despite this, engaging them meaningfully in national development is a government obligation since they are the future labour force. A paradigm shift in business and employment known as social entrepreneurship encourages social transformation through building social capital. To solve the issue of youth employment and to strengthen their sense of social responsibility, it is crucial to encourage youth social entrepreneurship. Social entrepreneurship offers innovative approaches to social problems as well as new products, services, and other breakthroughs. Since youth is a period of exploration and experimenting, if youth are given the
